

The 20-Minute Reset:

How I Declutter My Brain (and My Home)

When Everything Feels Like Too Much

DO A BRAIN DUMP FIRST (5 MINUTES)

Write down everything that's in your head. Every task, every "I should really," every thing you're trying to remember.

Half the overwhelm isn't the clutter you can see — it's the invisible to-do list running on loop. Once it's written down, your brain can relax enough to focus.

PICK ONE SURFACE (5 MINUTES)

Not the whole house. One surface. The kitchen counter. The dining table. The bathroom shelf. Just one.

Clear everything off it. Wipe it down. Only put back what actually belongs there. Everything else either has a home somewhere else, goes in a "deal with it" basket, or gets tossed.

A clean surface does something to your nervous system. It signals that things are okay, that you're in control.

SET UP TOMORROW FOR SUCCESS (5 MINUTES)

This is the step most people skip and it's the one that actually changes everything.

Before you go to bed — or right after the kids are down — do three things:

- 1 Put out whatever you'll need in the morning (bags, shoes, lunches if you can)
- 2 Write down your top three priorities for tomorrow, not your full to-do list, just three
- 3 Do a quick kitchen reset so you wake up to a clean counter instead of last night's chaos

LET SOMETHING BE GOOD ENOUGH (5 MINUTES)

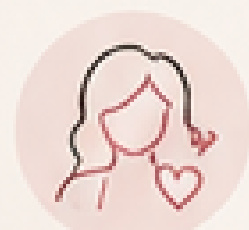

Sometimes the reset isn't about doing more. It's about deciding what you're going to let go of today.

- The laundry can live in the basket another night.
- The playroom doesn't need to be perfect before bed.
- The inbox can wait until tomorrow.

Giving yourself permission to call it done — even when it's not perfect — is its own kind of organization. It's choosing your peace over the pursuit of a standard that was never realistic in the first place.

The truth about staying organized as a mom

Organization isn't a personality trait you either have or don't. It's a set of small decisions you make over and over again, and some days you'll nail it and some days you won't.

The goal isn't a spotless house. The goal is a home that functions well enough that you can actually be present in it — for your kids, for yourself, for the life you're actually living.

The 20-minute reset isn't about being on top of everything. It's about getting back to good enough on the days when everything feels like too much.

And honestly? Good enough is more than enough.
